Tips From Students

Making the most of tutorials and other opportunities to discuss your progress.

Interacting with and respecting your tutors will help you build a good relationship. Working closely with them will help you to get the support you need throughout your university journey.

Be organised with your feedback.

Figure out what works for you and have it somewhere that is accessible for you to re-visit for your next assignment.

Feedback from fellow students can be useful. Surround yourself with peers that are constructive and honest.

Recognising negative feedback is a productive way to improve. Remember that feedback is for your own benefit and growth.

Engage with your feedback through discussion and clarify anything you do not understand.

Break down your feedback and acknowledge where each comment can apply itself within your work.

Making action plans with clear targets will help you to apply the feedback you've received.

Actively seek opportunities to receive feedback.

It's All About The Feedback

Feedback is a learning opportunity! It helps to guide you in your journey of development.

Feedback can be both casual and formal. Take note of day to day conversations with tutors as well as written assessment notes.

Feedback will give you ideas about how to improve your practice. It will also teach you about your learning style.

Feedback is an interaction. It needs a two way communication.

Feedback can be applied in future tasks and across many modules.

Feedback is there to help you move forward and grow within your practice.

Feedback is most helpful when collected from lots of different people, for example other students.
